Naturally, the number of participants in the Erasmus Mundus programme is not exactly equal per country or region. For example, a few years ago higher education institutions from Eastern Europe, Western Balkans and Central Asia as well as the three Central European countries (Austria, Hungary, Slovakia) seemed to be underrepresented. This encouraged the ECCE Mundus team to help increase the number of programme participants by creating an on-line database collecting information on Erasmus Mundus scholarship opportunities. In addition, they held a series of training seminars (in Vienna, Bratislava, Almaty and twice in Budapest). Thanks to all those activities, representatives of various Higher Education Institutions from the regions concerned got access to practical information (with proper briefings for every institution before and after every seminar) and valuable contacts with potential EU partners. Next to universities, the project tried also to reach Master and PhD students and employers.

"ALMOST THREE QUARTERS OF SEMINAR PARTICIPANTS DEVELOPED THEIR IDEAS INTO ACTUAL PROJECT PROPOSALS"

What is your best project memory?

The ECCE Mundus project was the best project-related experience in our professional career. The project idea was built on a very clear needs analysis, taking into account Erasmus Mundus participation of all three countries and targeted partner countries involved. The workshop consisted of a series of activities that had already proven to be useful in other projects before, however they had never been combined in one place. So this might be the main success factor of the ECCE Mundus project - a clear needs analysis, clearly identified target groups and activities that fit well the purpose.

But there is more to that. Collaborating closely with colleagues in other countries within a small project team was very encouraging and motivating not only as far as project activities were concerned but it also improved the everyday work of our Erasmus Mundus National Structure and later on of the Erasmus+ National Agency. Getting out of the office and meeting the colleagues in person, producing concrete project outputs together, maintaining intensive communication throughout the year, these are sources of many pleasant memories. Moreover, members of the project team have gathered a number of new skills, useful knowledge and professional experience. And it does not matter whether the backdrop of the scene was one of the capitals in Central Europe, Bratislava, Budapest or Vienna or a distant Almaty in Central Asia! The success of each event and its networking dimension was well supported by good food, like typical Wiener schnitzel in Vienna, goulash in Budapest, various sausages in Bratislava and tasty horse meat dishes in Almaty.

What was the most important thing you learnt during the implementation of the project?

For us the most important thing we've learnt was the discovery that when you are part of a small project team there is no chance to be a "sleeping partner". You must communicate and anything you do for don't do has a strong impact on the project, both in a positive as well as in a negative way. But in return you get an amazing feeling of owning the project and extremely close cooperation that you can hardly ever experience in big networks. This is the phenomenon which makes people say "this project is my baby".

And what do you like about your project?

We are really glad that we have reached a certain level of sustainability in the project. The ECCE Mundus project was meant to increase the participation of higher education institutions in Austria, Hungary and Slovakia and countries in Eastern Europe, Central Asia and Western Balkans in the EU programmes of Erasmus Mundus and Tempus. In the light of the launch of the Erasmus+ programme and its new possibilities for funding, the ECCE Mundus project was more than welcome by the target groups. For many of them it was the first source of information and guidance on the new programme. It also promoted internationalisation of higher education in all its forms. As the final ECCE Mundus impact survey showed, virtually all participants were motivated to continue contacts and cooperation ideas initiated during the seminars, and almost three quarters of ECCE Mundus seminar participants continued to develop their project ideas with new partners into actual project proposals. Moreover, those who experienced the ECCE Mundus project still tend to contact the ex-ECCE Mundus team for information on the Erasmus+ programme. They visit the project website and download the compendia of project ideas as well as search the database of Erasmus Mundus courses offered in AT, HU and SK. This is what we like about the project very much.

What was the most difficult moment and how did you cope with it?

The ECCE Mundus application was submitted in a period when there was minimum information about the next generation of EU programmes in the field of education and research. The original working plan was based on the Erasmus Mundus and Tempus reality. With the launch of Erasmus+ many elements of the project had to be revised and solutions had to be found in order to keep the project relevant for the target groups. But thanks to a well-working partnership we agreed quickly on a plan B and in the end we implemented the project successfully.

During project implementation we also had some difficulties and major issues which had indirect effects on our agenda and thus, the project started with some delay. Nevertheless, we not only managed to realise the three planned contact seminars but due to efficient use of funds we also organised two additional events.

Looking from today's perspective, what would you have improved in the project implementation?
If you organise an event in an EU country and Association for International Cooperation

participants from outside the EU, you should take into account that more effort and time will be needed, especially due to visa requirements or simply greater travel distances. The same applies to the workload, which can become surprisingly heavy, if you offer reimbursement of travel and accommodation costs to seminar participants after the event. Given all that, we would probably foresee more time for event organisation.

Has the EM Action 3 initiative encouraged you to continue the work initiated during the project?

Yes, it did. The three partner countries still collaborate with each other and created fruitful synergies. Moreover, we are in touch with a group of alumni of the Mundus courses covered by ECCE: we inform them about our activities and invite them to our events. It is always a great pleasure to meet our past participants during various events like conferences or info days. It happened several times that a person who started as a participant trained by the consortium proved later on to be a successful project manager and became one of our resource persons.

How and by whom the outcomes of your project will be used in the future? Will students have a particular benefit from the outcome?

ECCE Mundus seminars will serve as an example and inspiration for future Erasmus+ National Agencies activities, both in terms of content as well as structure. Results and experiences gained during the implementation of the project will be used in the promotion of the centralised actions of Erasmus+. In-depth knowledge on the joint and double degrees will be disseminated in conferences and training seminars.

The end-users (i.e. representatives of academia) may have permanent access to project outcomes published on the project's website (as compendia of projects). Students interested in joint study programmes can get a quick overview of Erasmus+/Erasmus Mundus joint programmes offered by higher education institutions in Austria, Hungary and Slovakia in an attractive promotion brochure and an online course database.
